The ultimate aim of this proposal is to combine several of our new discoveries from a variety of sources to achieve our goal of providing better clinical management of urolithiasis. It is virtually certain that all large urinary stones pass without intervention within a short period. The only important problem is to differentiate patients who have passed a stone and have no residual stone disease from those who may have some residual calculi and need surgery. This is especially true for lower urinary tract stones (as in upper urinary tract stones, such stones almost certainly do not need a second procedure). This problem is further complicated by the frequency with which multiple small lower urinary tract stones will be found. The major aim of our experiments is to find a unique way of detecting residual lower urinary tract stones using specific and sensitive methods. Our experiments will combine our new observations of stone passage, the evolution of new diagnostic modalities such as gamma- and alpha-scintigraphy, our new observations of the chemistry of urinary stone pathogenesis, and the recent ability to obtain large numbers of urine specimens from the normal population. We intend to determine whether there are factors which give a clue to some specific characteristics of the stone which can be easily identified in urine specimens after passage of a stone. We will also determine whether the presence of a urinary crystal (e.g. magnesium ammonium phosphate) can be accurately detected after passage of a stone. For future tests, we propose to use urine specimens in which the patient had recently passed a stone. The feasibility of this approach will be tested by the use of a high ammonium solution as a stimulus for stone passage. Pogo (top left), was first seen in 1952. Home land video recording devices (HVRS) are portable devices intended to gather, preserve and/or distribute home security related information. HVRS are known in the art and form the subject matter of U.S. Pat. No. 6,742,013 and pending continuation U.S. Ser. No. 10/985,970, both of which are hereby incorporated by reference. Generally, HVRS are known as stand-alone systems. HVRS record events that occur in a monitored home. Such events may include baby or elderly care, fire and smoke alarms, burglar and/or child security, medical, and emergency codes. To monitor the home a user typically programs a centralized or wireless controller device (WCD) and the HVRS into the programming routines of the WCD. The home is then monitored and information related to monitored events is distributed to the user, other responsible entities, law enforcement and emergency responders. Currently, HVRS provide predefined alerts for monitored events. For example, an HVRS may be programmed to produce an alert when a baby's or elderly care security system is activated. Typically, an additional alert is produced when a user has not authorized the alert. An example of nonauthorized alert would be when the user is not readily located for the event. When the user is located the alert is often not properly handled by the user or the municipality in which the user resides. In other words, typically the HVRS will sound an alert and the user often closes the program on the WCD thereby ignoring or muting the alert and also failing to record the event. Often when the WCD is remotely located an individual, incapable of "live" monitoring, is required to travel to the system location and either manually mute or properly handle the alert. Either situation is undesirable and in many cases creates delays that can result in further tragedies. U.S. Pat. No. 6,742,013 discloses an improved home alarm and monitoring system in which location locating data is combined with visual and/or audible alerts produced by a HVRS. As such, the HVRS produces a warning when a
