Among these potential factors, the first question that comes to mind is whether these adverse outcomes are more frequent for older drivers of less education or of low income. This question can be answered by examining the impact of age and education or income on adverse motor vehicle crash (MVC) outcomes. Previous research \([@B25],[@B26]\)] have observed that both older age and lower levels of education are significantly associated with a higher odds of being involved in a MVC. In addition, low income level was also found to be associated with an increased odds of a MVC \([@B27],[@B28]\)]. Other studies \([@B27],[@B30]\)] have also reported that
