Yours truly, Lily PS: thank you so much for the memorable experience, during the interview and training. A: In general, for a given system, this problem is simply undefined in a deterministic way. Even if you know exactly how the activation code should be generated, it is impossible to get this value to every single user at the same time as they request it. If you have more users than you can reach in a timeframe you give yourself to generate this value, you either need to give it to fewer users or not at all. The only known solution in practice is simply to not try to generate this value. If you sell a license and the activation key is given away freely (or the license is given away freely and optionally accompanied by a code that permits the use of activated licenses), do not use this activation key generation method (which can potentially still be a problem, but it's potentially solvable). Instead, you can generate a value that can be used to activate a license (or license bundle) without the activation key. This value is called a "license key" or "activation certificate", and it never requires a code to be turned in. Once generated, you use it to activate the license/bundle and then you record all the data generated to perform this process as you'd normally record the identity of the license/bundle being activated, plus any additional data you are obliged to record when you activate a license/bundle (like the activation code). Because there are no activation codes to turn in, you can generate a unique value for each person/bundle/group of people/bundles/... that you want to activate so there is no way you can accidentally activate two people or bundles in the same way that it would be difficult to accidentally generate the same activation key for the same person twice (and there is no reliable way to tell you did indeed generate a key twice). Effect of 25-hydroxycholesterol on mitochondrial translation and oxidative phosphorylation of hepatic cells. 25-hydroxycholesterol (25-OHC), the major oxysterol produced by cell cholesterol metabolism, was analyzed for its ability to inhibit hepatic mitochondrial translation and oxygen consumption in primary rat hepatocytes. Mitochondrial translation and oxidative phosphorylation were markedly inhibited by 25-OHC in a concentration-dependent manner. Mitochondrial translation, however, was much more sensitive to
