Alteration of memory (AM) can be postoperatively induced in the first week following a surgical procedure, suggesting its role as a neurocognitive disorder, and is known to be influenced by intracranial lesions. However, it remains to be elucidated whether AM can be induced as a postoperative memory syndrome (PMS) independent of any pre-existing lesion. We assessed the validity of the memory alteration in 58 patients who underwent surgery for brain tumours. AM was assessed using a visual reproduction task, which required the subjects to imagine and reproduce during a video-taped sequence a series of items. This visual reproduction task was administered before, on the postoperative third day and before surgery, before the end of surgery (control session), and at 1, 2 and 4 weeks after surgery. Subjects with PMS exhibited c6a93da74d
